During a Crisis

Set Clear Goals and Show Support

Starting a role with a new employer (or being promoted) is a challenging transition at any time, let alone during a crisis. It's necessary to set clear goals with your new employee and let them know they are not alone.

Mentoring and Shadowing

In the circumstances we face today, sitting in a classroom or spending hours in online trainings aren't feasible. It's key for new employees to be set up with mentors and to shadow those who can guide them.

Take a Break

Encourage your new employees to set aside a few minutes in the day to catch their breath, do a quick 5-minute walk, or meditate. This will boost their energy and improve circulation.

Virtual Interaction

Meeting face-to-face might not be possible in today's fast-paced environment. Virtual meetings are a great alternative to in-person conversations and an easy way to get to know coworkers. Allowing your new employees to meet people from other departments over video chat can help them understand everyone's role and how they all interact together.
